Internet Pioneers

Nowadays, we are so connected to our smartphones, tablets and laptops, that it's hard to imagine what life was like before the Internet. In reality, however, the Internet is a fairly recent (00) B . Before the 1960s, multiple computers couldn't (1) together at the same time. In 1962, J.C.R. Licklider, a highly respected scientist, suggested connecting computers to improve communications and share information. It was not long before other networks were created (2) a variety of institutions to provide information sharing. Still, at this point, different networks had no way of communicating with each other. In 1983, another important step (3) when a new communications protocol was established called Transfer Control Protocol / Internetnetwork Protocol (TCP/IP). This allowed different kinds of computers on different networks to 'talk' to each other. The next major (4) came in 1989 when Tim Berners-Lee created the hypertext transfer protocol or HTTP, which gave different Internet platforms the ability to access the same site. Making the Grade

When I was very young, I fell and broke my leg, and had to spend some time in hospital. It was then that I first became (00) A to be a doctor the day. My mother likes to show a photograph she took of (1) when I was just 4 years old — bandaging the arm of one of my dolls with toilet paper. Even in (2) , I would tell my teachers that when I grew up I wanted to become a doctor and help children. I knew that, to make my dream come true, I had to work hard. In high school, I never missed classes to go to the mall as my friends often did. I preferred to study and even (3) advanced classes in biology and chemistry. In the end, my hard work paid off. I was able to graduate a full year early from high school and got a (4) to study medicine at a top university. Of course, medical school was even more challenging, but I was ambitious and wanted to do my very best. After medical school, I specialised in children's medicine. At the hospital where I work now, my colleagues and I always help and support (5) as we do our best to save children's lives. Looking back, I realise that it took a lot of hard work to get where I am today, but I don't regret any of it. My dream really did come true!
